Change

By Col. Tim Tarchick
934th Airlift Wing commander

Well, it's over. After the longest campaign in history (more than 20 months), a president elect has been chosen. And while the president-elect's message was "change", that doesn't mean that all things must take a 180 degree turn. Some of the things we do here at the 934th Airlift Wing will always remain the same.

Most importantly, the one thing that will never change is our commitment to defend American's freedoms. I am blessed to work with a group of people who share the Air Force core values; service before self, excellence in all we do and integrity first. In fact, there isn't a more dedicated group of people in the AF than you. I truly believe and see that.

Although your support and service is top-notch, there are always other areas we could "change." There is always room for improvement in our relationships with others. As public servants, we have been put in charge of much. And much is expected of us not only from the American citizens but from those whom we are in authority over.

This is a hard time of year for some of our brothers and sisters in uniform. Some of them are finding it hard to make ends meet in this economically stressful time. Some of them are worried about losing a civilian job around the holidays. Some are stressed about the financial hardships this country is currently going through.

It is our responsibility to look out for each other by being a good wingman. This season, let's look out for our fellow man, especially our fellow Airman. For your fellow man: Volunteer at a local food shelter, donate a toy to Toys for Tots or donate coats to a homeless shelter. For your fellow Airmen: Make sure they know you are there for them, ensure they know where to get financial help if they need it and make sure they are invited to the various holiday festivities on base. There are a lot of Airmen who will be spending the holidays alone this year. It's our responsibility to improve our commitment to them, to ensure they know they are part of the greatest family in the world ... the Air Force family.

Thank-you for all you do and remember the Reason for the season... God Bless you all.

Survey reveals readers want newspaper changes

By Capt. S.J. Brown
934th Airlift Wing Public Af-

For the first time ever, the 934th Public Affairs office conducted its annual newspaper readership survey with the 934th Service's Squadron's Services Courier survey during the wing commander's annual commander's call here Oct. 5.

And the results were rather eye-opening to members of both staffs, the main comment by pollsters being to add more details to the two publications.

About 10 percent of the military members present at the commander's call completed the survey. Of those, more than 85 percent said they got the majority of their news from the Viking Flyer and 75 percent said they read the publication monthly. All-in-all, the majority of readers who took the survey said they were happy with the design and size of the newspaper but would like to see more photos of people and more details on other Air Force units.

One issue that the PA office is investigating is the fact that less than a quarter of the participants claimed to have received their newspapers on time at their home address. To ensure your Viking Flyer reaches you, you should ensure your home address is updated with the Military Personnel Flight here.

The bottom line is your voice was heard and the PA office staff will try hard to comply with all survey takers' suggestions.

'Yes, I'm contagious'

By Capt. S.J. Brown
934th Airlift Wing Public Affairs

I get all giddy as I watch the white space on the thermometer get smaller and the red part get bigger. As the blood red color inches closer and closer to its intended target at the top, I feel ... well, I feel contagious.

While most people are watching their unit's Combined Federal Campaign "contribution thermometer" to ensure the unit is making its goal, I am watching it for another reason altogether. You see, I am an optimist, sometimes overly so to the annoyance of the people in my office. Yes, I am contagious with hope. But, that is the entire reason why I get so excited when I see more donations come in to the CFC.

More donations to the CFC means more people are genuinely concerned about the welfare of others so much so that they are giving their hard-earned money to charities (even in this time of economic unrest and uncertainty). That thermometer's temperature rising means people aren't simply looking out for Number One but are contributing to hope. Hope for a cure, hope for the homeless, hope for the hungry, hope for peace. Hope is contagious. That much is evident in last year's CFC contributions. In 2007, more than one million dollars were donated by approximately 24,000 federal employees (the average gift was $310). That means 24,000 people were contagious with hope and caring last year.

As wonderful as being contagious with hope is, I will admit though that I was a bit overwhelmed when I sat down with my CFC book of charitable organizations.

How do I choose which organizations will receive my donation? There are thousands of them! Well, CFC makes it rather easy. The program breaks down the charities into 26 different categories such as "housing / shelter" and "animal related." I have a system I use making it easier to choose. I simply choose my top five priorities, assign them to a CFC category and find charities within that category that appeal to me. Examples include: because I have a child, I choose a charity in the "Youth Development" category; because my mother died of a stroke, I choose a charity in the "Medical Research" category; and since I am a tree hugger, I choose a charity in the "Environmental Quality, Protection, and Beautification" category.

Whatever the category or the charitable organization, I give because I care, just like millions of others in this nation. Now, there is even more time to donate. I just heard that the Northern Light CFC (available online at www.northernlightscfc.org) has been extended to Dec. 15 for the Minneapolis-St. Paul Air Reserve Station members. Donations can be made online at the website above until Dec. 15 as well. The Northern Lights CFC is striving to reach a $1.2 million goal this year. This year, let's break the thermometer by going over the goal. Why? Because we care and because caring is contagious.

Who is your biggest inspiration? My family is the reason I do what I do. Without their support, I couldn't do what I do for the Air Force. I can't explain what it's like to be loved like I'm loved by my family. It truly is humbling.

What does your service in the Reserve mean to you? My service in the Reserve gives me the opportunity to continue my service and pursue medical school. I didn't want to leave the Air Force, but it was becoming increasingly difficult for me to complete school while doing my job as a crew chief. The Air Force Reserve was the answer. I can still serve my country will attending school full time.

Electronic OPR/EPRs become reality

RANDOLPH AIR FORCE BASE, Texas -- An Air Force Enterprise Information Management initiative to process officer and enlisted performance reports electronically became reality Oct. 1 when the Air Force Personnel Center endorsed the first of three phases of AF Electronic Workflow Processing, or AF e-WP, thanks to a partnership between AFPC, Pacific Air Forces and Air Education and Training Command's communication directorates.

"The major benefit of this effort is to reduce the workload associated with preparing officer and enlisted performance reports by providing availability of a standard process Air Force-wide," said Chief Master Sgt. Charles Spase, AFPC's EIM program manager.

"If you remember how we used to route EPRs—hand-carrying around a hard copy report in those Air Force blue folders—electronic workflow processing now gives us an 'electronic blue folder' capability," the chief added.

Chief Spase also explained the AF-e WP program provides an electronic site picture through SharePoint, the system all major commands now work with, of a unit's activities by sharing information at all levels and receiving immediate feedback. "It allows a visible, standardized action plan to achieve suspenses, manage tasks and track metrics efficiently and effectively for everyone in the chain of command," the chief said.

"Feedback from the field was that we said, 'Here – we made an electronic form, use it,' but we never developed guidance on a standardized process," said Col. Glenn Rattell, AFPC's director of personnel data systems. "So, thanks to the support of AETC's communication directorate, we were able to roll out a standardized electronic process to give back to the field," the colonel added.

"While developing Phase I of AF e-WP at Hickam Air Force Base, we quickly realized changing culture was more of a challenge than creating a technical solution. We're all proud PACAF was able to super-charge an effort to give time back to Airmen and develop the final product with the rest of the Air Force," said Capt. Reid Novotny, a Headquarters PACAF communications action officer.

Through collaboration among all major command communication directorates, EIM capabilities will be implemented across the entire Air Force, according to said Col. Theresa Giorlando, AETC director of communications.

"With the leadership of Air Force Communications Agency, we're combining the efforts of all the major commands to apply successes and lessons learned to standardize this electronic performance report process," Colonel Giorlando said.

On the scene

Army and Air Force first responders arrive at an “accident” as part of a joint-service three-day emergency medical technician refresher training here Oct. 31. The medics, from local Reserve and National Guard units, are required to complete the recertification every two years. Training is provided free of charge and saves the units thousands of dollars annually. (Air Force photo/Master Sgt. Paul Zadach)
